

WHAT WILL BE WORN

Bizarre Effects in Skirts and Shoulder Capes.

BROWN THE COMING COLOR

The Bicycle Knickerbockers Make Their Appearance and a Variation at Long Beach.

What a blessing it is that the American social season has grown shorter at both ends!

Thirty years ago Newport was a city of hotels. Lenox was not—the Lenox of transplanted luxury, I mean.

And so the gay world of the day missed the glorious pleasures of autumn

days like these, when the woods are growing crisp and brown and yellow and the air of evening is chill, when the sunsets are those of Italy, the moons of Neptune, the nights of Norway, when summer's languor disappears and gay parties make the night merry with festivities under these great farmhouse roofs.

The autumn can be read in a social assembly as easily as in the congress of the beech and ash trees. One feels the altered note. There is a freshness in the new notes that speaks of changing seasons and of changing styles.

But the change is gradual. A frock which I saw yesterday at a great country house at Stockbridge, N.Y., miles from the railroad—a country house whose great hall rises clear to the roof, a railed gallery around it leading to the rooms on the second story, and whose hospitable roof shelters many guests—reminded me of the fact, it is the dress—our night consider a calling costume or a ceremonial out-of-door dress. It was of dark material, a lustrous blue with a good deal of purple in it, I think, and I noticed that while the skirt fell in unbroken folds with but moderate fullness there were five-shoulder capes covering the light shoulders, which were covered with light embroidery. The same embroidery completely filled the yoke, embellished the collar and belt, and swept about the skirt in six heavy horizontal rows. The effect was one of much force and color, but the useless shoulder capes over the sleeves make one despair of the future. They are going, yet not gone.

That skirts are growing shorter is something to be thankful for, or might be, were there not so many regrettable tendencies in other directions. The massing of ruffles over the hips, the employment of wildernesses of frills and puffs and "pinkies" and such devices show that the mind of Paris is at the farthest verge of frivolity.

The Modern Beauty Thrives on good food and sunshine, with plenty of exercise in the open air. Her form glows with health and her face roses, at the edge is generally a deep crimson; radiating of pink silk, intermingled with lace—'chicoree' means coffee colored. The under skirt is pink taffeta glass, and the whole costume is finished off with mouse velvet bows. With these dresses large capelines of cream lace are worn ornamented with roses and bows of moss-green velvet. White linen dresses are also much in vogue, trimmed with Florentine lace; the bodies are prettily trimmed with insertion of this lace, lined with a color—pink, blue or moss green. The sleeves are the leg of mutton shape, either in white linen or velvet, to match the color of the silk lining under the insertion.

Dust cloaks—we used to call them "dusters"—have come back with the other lines for out-of-door diversions. They are not pretty but useful. The winter cloaks will be big, bulky, heavy shouldered, big-sleeved and altogether unsuitable to any figure but the tallest and most slender.

REKES OSBORN.

What could be more grotesque—and in costume the grotesque is always bad—than an autumn calling dress which caused the Lenox ladies to quiver an indignant protest once sunny afternoon and three skirts, all of some dark, rough textured material, all not rather full. A simple belt and a bow at the bosom completed a gown which might at least have been comparatively unobtrusive but for the horrible device of "pinkies" at the edges of the three capes and the three skirts with horrible sharp zigzags like the edge of a saw. It was one both on edge—but we shall yet become accustomed to such freaks. It is a freakish time and a freakish mode, my visitors. It is in its death throes.

Fin de siècle, indeed, is a bigging costume, which I have mentioned some attention as it flashed through Long Beach worn by a dear little blonde, who has more comeliness in her pretty head than her mild blue-eyes would indicate. She is a literary woman who has taken to the wheel for health and enjoyment, and has met and mastered the abomination of skirts. Her costume, then, was as follows: Blouse and knickerbockers of dark blue, stockings of the same, blue cap with shawl device, a fluff of white at throat and wrist, and sensible tan shoes. Comment was considerable, but rose. Comment was a whisper, as a very muscular and determined-looking husband was the little lady's body guard.

Will the example be generally followed? Who knows? We hear of such daring women all the way from San Francisco to Boston. Perhaps before the century closes women will have evolved a bicycle dress, which will meet the critics on both hands. One legion women are learning—never was cloth so cheap, never was it so easy to have costume tailored to every use. There is nothing inconsistent—not to mention other considerations—when a woman who last night swept the polished floor grandly with her silk train and raised white gleaming shoulders from the perfumed lace of her low bodice to-day dons short skirt and slippers for the gymnasium. Put the dress to its use as well as to its wearer is becoming "fin de siècle." Perhaps even the knickerbockers—but let us leave bold prophecy for safe coils of observation.

There was another New York lady here, a bird of passage from Saratoga, with ever so many trunks, who wore a costume that pleased me much, at a lawn party near Pittsfield. A dark sleeveless jacket, close cut and brought nearly together in front by a clasp. Above the clasp the jacket was edged with lace and underneath it was worn a plaited shirt front and collar, a dark skirt and lace over sleeves completing. I have never liked women wearing of starched "fronts"—since why should they imitate the worst features of men's attire—but indeed the costume was chic and serviceable looking.

It might be called the great year of the jacket. How it happened, no one knows. Certainly it was not contemplated by the modistes, but the jacket in its dozen or more different forms has been all but ubiquitous. They tell such stories of the world's fair—of nineteen women out of twenty wearing Eton jackets—that I must go to see.

Pink and white girls—happy creatures—will always like pink and white gowns, no matter what the modes say. Such a one I have seen this week was of white satin faintly shot with pink, with an accordion kilted drape of shot pink and white gauze stuff extending half way down the skirt. The bodice was made of the same stuff as the drape, and on one side was fastened a bunch of naturalistic pink roses. In such a costume one may break Paris.

From Paris come some lovely costumes in the same exquisite tints. They say that the French girls have been wearing at Dieppe and Trouville a great number of pretty pink poupaudou, mullin costumes, and most coquettish they are. The pink muslins are bedstrewn with bouquets of pink
